Within New York State are several American Indian territories, which operate as sovereign governments. The complex relationships among those tribes, the federal government and the state is a subject that is rarely taught in law school and is not on the bar exam. Yet, many lawyers admitted to practice law in New York State are likely to interact with Indian tribes or their members as they represent clients in commercial transactions, on real estate issues, on taxation questions and in court. This hour will address in nutshell form what New York lawyers need to know about this interesting topic.
